TRAX sculpture in waiting

Cordell Taylor, a welder-fabricator with the Phillips Gallery, works on a sculpture that will accent the TRAX light-rail Ballpark station, 250 W. 1300 South. More than a year remains before TRAX light-rail cars will actually begin picking up and discharging passengers at the station, but humanlike figures already are waiting thanks to Taylor. All six Salt Lake stations will be adorned by artistic creations.

Students still weren't sure if their forklifts would actually function properly.

The first of nine bleary-eyed groups that participated saw its computer program crash. Millett and Cowley had their problems as well. "Last night we left at 2 o'clock and our forklift was working fine then. Now it's not," Cowley said. "There are so many things that can go wrong."

Once the competition started, though, Herman did Millett and Cowley proud by finishing the course, albeit with some human intervention. Still, not many forklifts were able to finish, even with human intervention, which was expected to make it challenging."

The competition, Smith says, helps students apply what they are studying, and then some. "They had to learn more than just what they learned in class."

The purpose of the mechatronics class is to integrate a number of engineering disciplines — mechanical, electrical and computer — in order to design complex machines that have practical, real-world application.

And working with Legos, a familiar childhood toy for many students, made the process entertaining, too.

"I played with Legos as a kid," Cowley said. "It was fun doing it again."
